My view of the lockout laws comes from someone who has moved to Sydney from overseas (specifically London) to enjoy what this beautiful city has to offer.

From what I've experienced, the lock out laws have stripped the city of its diversity and freedom of choice making it little more than a 'beach town'. How can a city thrive, when people aren't even trusted to be in a club past 1.30pm and buy a bottle of wine after 10pm. It's making it a frustrating place to live. And even more frustrating, is the potential it has to be one of the best cities in the world.

You're stripping Sydney people of the freedom of choice and taring everyone with the same antisocial brush. There is no energy to be felt here, and just a ghost town of 'used to be' bars and clubs.

The future of Sydney looks bleak to me if it carries on the way it's going. Bring back Sydney as it should be. No-one wants to remember a city that has no soul.
