My wife and I returned to london at beginning of last year and have really noticed a change, for the worse, in how the city is run. The new liquor law seems to be taking a 'better safe than sorry' approach, and also taking old peoples viewpoints into account a lot more than young peoples. I don't think this is the key to having a vibrant, worldly city. I understand that there was an alcohol violence problem, but shutting everything down seems like a very poor solution.
