Hello

I write to tell you about my saddened disappointment with the current state of vibrancy in what could be a great city. I moved here from London in 2014 just as the lock out laws stranglehold took effect. I have therefore had a rather depleted view of the after dark scene in Sydney. I know from speaking to locals it hasn't always been this way.

I have enjoyed some of Europe's finest cities and they are just as vibrant if not more at night. You don't even see people sat outside restaurants of an evening in the city in Sydney. It's very unsettling. It's a joke to think that this is ok. We will end up dropping Sydney off the list of places to go (or certainly return to) from global visitors' itineraries.

Aside from an ever concerning atmosphere of spiralling (justified) mistrust with primary decision makers in the state. I believe there needs to be drastic change.

Thanks

Peter Marcinkowski
