Hello,

I feel like the streets of Sydney are more unsafe since the introduction of the lockout laws. There are less people on the street and as a 35 year old female I do not feel as safe walking around late at night.

I like the way that cities like Berlin have much more lenient drinking laws - people can legally drink on the streets, anywhere and at anytime. It creates a new atmosphere and people are much more responsible with their drinking - knowing that they don't know have to quickly drink at home before heading out.

I also don't think the lockout laws are helping with tourism and the hospitality industry. Sydney isn't a fun place for tourists to come too.

I hope that the lockout laws are lifted and more lenient drinking laws are introduced where the public can be responsible for their own behaviours.

Thanks,

Erin Matheson
