Sir,

Whilst I acknowledge the need to keep Sydney's streets safe, there must be better way to do this than the current blanket 1.30am lock-outs and 3am last drinks.

Has there, for instance, been any consideration of increased late-night public transport? Perhaps consider the Melbourne model - 24-hour public transport on weekends.

Rather than a 'blanket' policy, why not allow those bars and clubs with good safety records to continue trading without restrictions?

When you consider the number of people who are negatively affect by these lock-out laws (both those who work in the CBD area a night and those who enjoy its services) it only seems fair to consider these ideas, especially since the casinos are exempt from the current restrictions.
