In my opinion putting more laws around our liquor consumption doesnt resolve the problem it sugar coats it. I worked in hospitality for around 10years and it is easy to see the australians have no appreciation for how alcohol should be consumed. We need to work on the way australians culturally drink which then in turn should help behaviours.

Im not sure how you start to change a cultural idea about something but i think that trying to do anything is better than just limiting it. Its like saying to a toddler dont eat the lollies in the lolly jar.... they just try harder to get them or find another way.

And for all useless cowards who are behaving like neandathols and throwing one punch hits they have an issue with violence and they will always struggle to control that behaviour, harsher punishment is necessary with less forgiveness.

I also think education to the younger generations is going to make more differnece than these laws... so invest money and time in our younger generations to make a change.

Thats all for now, i really hope this does get read and makes the tiniest of difference. Peace
