The facts that assaults have decreased should surely be sufficient to continue with the "lock out laws" The medical profession have also supported their retention following a decrease in the number of unprovoked attacks with their associated costs for hospitalisation and the hidden cost of lost productivity and ongoing support. The main proponents for a relaxation of the lock out laws seem to be the alcohol industry due to a loss of profits on their part. If the industry can't sell enough alcohol before 3am then I would suggest they are not particularly efficient operators and should consider removing themselves to an alternate industry which does not require their assuming responsibility for their greed and disregard for the communities wellbeing
